What is Art Therapy?

Art Therapy is one of the most popular, innovative forms of psychotherapy being used today. It offers the opportunity for expression and communication of thoughts, feelings and experiences through the creative modalities of art media and symbolism, often directly accessing the unconscious to facilitate healing and self-awareness.

Clients do not need to have any experience or skill in art making – the process is not about creating aesthetic images, but about effecting change and growth through artistic expression in a safe and supportive environment. It is widely used for helping people with depression, relationship and identity issues, poor self esteem, fears, concerns, unhelpful behaviours or personal crisis and other mental health challenges.

Art Therapists are trained in a range of art processes including painting, drawing, writing, clay, collage, construction and sand play, as well as the psychology of mark-making and symbolism, psychological theories, verbal counselling skills and therapeutic practice.

Transpersonal Art Therapy acknowledges that we have a spiritual or intuitive realm of being that is beyond the personality self. Transpersonal Art Therapists aim to integrate this important aspect of a person’s inner life within the therapeutic context.

Graduate Opportunities

Art Therapy graduates normally work in organisations that provide psychological therapies or support. Art Therapy is rapidly becoming a recognised profession and graduates are now working as part of mental health teams within institutions as well as setting up their own practices. It can also be nested within other roles and used as an additional therapeutic tool in traditional helping professions such as social work, nursing and counselling.

Art Therapy is applicable to a broad range of areas such as children and youth services, Aboriginal health, mental health, teaching, correctional services, community art, aged care, homelessness and domestic violence support services, paediatric and palliative care.

“Art Therapies offer a unique opportunity for our clients to express their journey using a broader, often more meaningful, medium than the standard “talking about it”. Through the expert training of an IKON student these people are safely guided to find outlets for their thoughts and feelings- many of which are as poignant as the soul can go. ” Sara, Nurse Practitioner, Paediatric Palliative Care.
